Agricultural Situation

Wholesale Markets and Price Reporting

2005

Approved by:

---

Report Highlights:

This report summarizes how China's Ministry of Agriculture gathers, uses, and publishes wholesale commodity prices. FAS China began a database to analyze these reported prices in order to publish periodic commodity specific reports. The prices provide a reference for what growers and farmers could receive and what smaller volume wholesalers may procure. A sample of available reporting information is included along with two appendices listing the markets and commodities in the database to date.

Background

Since 1985, China's Ministry of Agriculture (MOA) supported the development of a large network of agricultural product wholesale markets. The markets, now numbering over 4,200, recorded approximately $44 billion in sales in calendar year 2003. MOA considers over 300 of the markets to be "major markets" supplying regional areas and major urban centers. Although, in recent years, fewer individual households are buying their food at these markets (see the November 2004 issue of AgExporter on China's supermarket growth at <http://www.fas.usda.gov/info/agexporter/2004/November/pgs%204-8.pdf>), MOA believes the markets remain an important link in the farm to chopsticks food chain supplying reference prices for farmers and growers around the country who may be selling to small, opportunistic traders who aggregate shipments for domestic or international distribution to restaurants, hotels, and grocers who would not necessarily source their goods through contractual production or direct imports. Additionally, tracking and reporting market price movements is one of the primary functions for MOA's Department of Market Information, which is responsible for supplying analysis to government leaders.

Beginning in Fall 2002, MOA started publicly providing daily prices for nearly 300 agricultural commodities sold at these major markets. The information is on two locations of its website: <http://www.agri.gov.cn/jghq/ly/> and more recently on <http://www.agri.gov.cn/pfsc/>. The listed website prices on the first site represent the transaction price for the largest volume of a commodity sold on each given day at each given market. The second website additionally provides the lowest and, when available, highest prices and production region for each commodity sold at each market on a given day. MOA receives this price information from wholesale market administrators who survey their vendors, record the prices, and then electronically forward or fax the information to the MOA main office in Beijing.

MOA's Data Collection Process

MOA uses the information to make weekly, monthly, and bi-annual reports on commodity prices for government officials interested in a wide array of issues from food basket inflation to the closest available data to farm gate prices and farmer incomes. The prices serve, as well, as an indicator for growers, farmers, traders, and local government officials around the country; helping make the marketplace more transparent for any commodity being sold whether it is domestic or imported.

Future Plans

MOA's next-step for the wholesale markets is to implement a system over the next several years that will indicate grades and quality for both domestically grown and imported commodities. This is being done through the development of numerous technical standards drafted by both MOA affiliated scientists and commercial interests. MOA admits the markets weakness is that not all agricultural goods transit the markets and therefore some commodities like those being exported or even those domestic and imported goods destined for China's food processing sector may be sourced directly from the fields or grown to contract and as such could be traded at higher or lower prices as reflected in Chinese Customs price data.

The value of MOA's on-the-ground network and the value of an open and transparent price system have been recognized by other government agencies; including the Ministry of Commerce and the National Development and Reform Commission. MOA reports other PRC government agencies are attempting to replicate MOA's system and also plan to assist with "green-box" investments in market facilities, e.g. cold-storage, commodity sanitation, roads, access to ports, etc. in these wholesale markets.

FAS China Information Now Available

Using MOA's price information the Agricultural Affairs Office in Beijing has created a database of these markets (see appendix one) and select commodities (see appendix two) for several sectors, including: aquatic products, fruit products, grains and oils, livestock and animal products, and certain vegetable products. As a reference, these prices may appear from time-to-time in USDA GAIN reports and may be classified by market, province, or region and by individual commodity (e.g. Fuji Apples, Green Apples, Fragrant Pears, Duck Pears, etc.) or by commodity groups (e.g. apples, pears, etc.) or by sector (e.g. deciduous fruit).

Sample Information

Twice a month, dating back to January 2003, FAS China accessed the MOA website and saved the wholesale market price information into our own database. The information can then produce a report, similar to the following:

Apple, Fuji
